Everybody's Talking

Pyramid crazy: Andrey and Victoria Vakhrushev from the village of Istinka near St. Petersburg, Russia, are enamoured by the Great Pyramid of Giza. In fact, they are so captivated by the ancient structure that they built a replica in their backyard. While much smaller than the original, the couple's creation is still a sight to behold. They thoroughly researched the project and applied similar specifications to scale. They ended up using about 400 tonnes of concrete blocks. Finding a contractor took a while, but eventually one agreed to take on the job

Sculpture garden: Xilitla, San Luis Potosi, in north central Mexico is the home of Las Pozas, a surrealistic sculpture garden. It was the brainchild of the late Edward James of England and was built between the 1960s and 1980s. A wealthy man, James loved orchids, and he grew many varieties on his Mexican property. However, everything was wiped out in a hailstorm in 1962. That's when he started building his tropical campus of interesting sculptures, with the help of his Mexican friend and foreman, Plutaco Gastelum. There are over 30 rock and concrete sculptures left today, going by such names as The Staircase to Heaven.

Tea time: It may come as a surprise that, in a tea-loving locale, the oldest tea shop in London began as a coffee shop more than 300 years ago. Today, the cafe is called Twinings Tea Shop, but when it opened three centuries ago, it was called Tom's Coffee House. It was started by Thomas Twining, who was in the business of importing commodities, including tea and coffee. His shop became known among his aristocratic customers to have some of the best tea in the city. Today, the shop still stands at 216 Strand, and the name "Twining" has gone down in history as a popular brand of tea.

Vertical cave: A deep cave in Mexico is called Sótano de las Golondrinas (Cave of the Swallows). Located in the forest in Aquismón, San Luis Potosí, this open-air cave shaft is over 370 metres (1,200 ft.) deep, and even deeper in some spots. Its name stems from the brightly coloured parakeets and swifts that settle down along the walls at night. In the morning, all the birds fly up and out of the cave, making a spectacular sight. The Cave of the Swallows also attracts human visitors who enjoy extreme sports. They jump in with a parachute or spend a full hour rappelling to the bottom using specialized ropes and gear.
