Everybody's Talking

Locked up: Getting a ring stuck on a finger is scary, but how about having a bicycle lock fastened around one's neck? That is what happened to a young mother from Huai'an, China, whose 4-year-old son slipped the bicycle U-lock around her neck and locked it. He did it in play, and the mom thought it was pretty funny—until she realized that neither of them knew the lock's combination. She went to the police, who didn't know what to do, so they called in the firefighters. With some fussing, they were able to cut the lock with wire cutters, protecting her neck with a towel. Everyone was greatly relieved when that lock came off!

Empty frames: Can two blank canvases be considered a work of art? Danish artist Jens Haaning seems to think so, because that is what he delivered to the Kunsten Museum of Modern Art in Aalborg, Denmark. The museum had loaned him 328,000 kroner and 25,000 Pounds in cash to be displayed in two pieces that would reproduce two of his past works, "An Average Danish Annual Income" and "An Average Austrian Annual Income," both of which displayed cash in a frame. When Haaning sent the empty frames to the museum, he said his new pieces were called "Take the Money and Run." So, Haaning said, he took the money and that was his work of art.

Pressing buttons: Imagine a moment when a parent is not obligated to admonish children to "get your hands off the elevator buttons!" When visiting Shimada Denki Seisakusho, an elevator button factory in Tokyo, Japan, children may press all the buttons they wish. That's because a display called "1,000 Buttons" is a wall that contains elevator buttons of all shapes and sizes. Just like in a real elevator, pressing the buttons causes them to light up. The company has existed for almost 90 years, and the wall displays all the buttons the factory has ever made. The display is so popular that the factory has a waiting list for visits.

Nutty problem: Red squirrels get quite busy in autumn when they start hiding food for the long winter months. One of these rodents in Fargo, North Dakota (U.S.), is busier than most, at least according to Bill Fischer, a pickup truck owner in that city. Over the years, Fischer has come home on many fall days to find his truck serving as the storage container for a red squirrel's stash of walnuts. The squirrel places the nuts around the engine, in the wheel well, and inside the front bumper. Once, after being away for a few days, Fischer collected a whopping 42 gallons of nuts from the crevices of his truck.

Helping paws: Service dogs are highly trained to help owners who have disabilities live more independent lives. They are chosen for their temperaments, including focus, affection, gentleness, and willingness to please.

Interesting ecosystem: An estuary is a spot where a freshwater river meets the ocean. The fresh and salt waters mingle, with the fresh water flowing on top because it is lighter. These ecosystems are fertile grounds for plant growth.

Reaching upward: When it opens in late 2022, the world's second tallest building will be a 118-story skyscraper known as Merdeka 118. Located in Kuala Lumpur, Malaysia, it stands 678.8 metres (2,227 feet) high.

Animal lover: When American actress Julia Roberts was a child, she loved animals and wanted to become a veterinarian. However, she followed her brother Eric Roberts to Hollywood. One of her early roles was playing "Daisy" in the 1988 movie, Mystic Pizza.
